On the Pier.

 I love longer. I see no fan in walking
 The party along the pavement, when I stroll
 To the tops of the houses. I wish people would be so stupidly particular, but would let have my way a little oftener."

"I found this young gentleman in a most safe place, ma'am," said the policeman to Mrs. Smith. "He was standing on a ledge over the shop door of Mr. Smith in the High Street, from which he might have fallen, and broken all his bones; and his neck into the bargain. I have had my eye upon him for some time, and it is my opinion that he has climbed a very good lamp in the town. I like to see a young street climber, but when it comes to standing in front of other people's bedroom windows, or dangling his legs on the tops of their chimneys, I think it is time to interfere." "So it is, policeman," said Fred's mother.

"I am much obliged to you for bringing me home, Fred," she added, turning to the policeman. "You see the danger you are in. If you do not leave off being so bold and venturesome, you will get into all sorts of trouble."

"Yes, that you will, young sir," said the policeman. "Be bold and brave by all means when it is good to be done by it; but a man or a woman who risks his life for nothing is just a fool, and deserves to be treated like one."

The policeman went away, and Fred and his sister were left together.

"It is very true what the policeman says," said Fred. "You will certainly go too far some day, if you then you will be sorry for it."

"Oh, no, mamma! It is quite safe, I assure you. I am very sure-footed. You never know how to fall and hurt myself, did you? And I am confident you never will."

"Do not be so certain, Fred. It is dangerous, and I should be much pleased if you would give up the habit."

But Fred did not attend to his mother's words as he ought to have done. He liked climbing too well to be easily persuaded to let it up. He had always indulged in it ever since he was a very little boy; and the fondness for it had grown upon him. He could never feel that he liked to walk down stairs in any other way. He liked to let himself down by banisters, to slide down the rail, or to jump from one story to the other. But as for sliding down as other people did, that he did slow and uninteresting. He received a lesson, however, that he did not soon forget. He was staying with his father and mother on the seaside, and of course he had very happy and good times there. Indeed he ought to have been so satisfied with the pleasures that were provided for him that he would not have been for those which were forbidden. When they were all going out together, Fred's mother reminded him to be careful. "Now, Fred, walk on the ground, and do not

"All right, mamma."
"Do you mean to do what your mother
said?" asked his father.
"Yes, papa, I always do only sometimes I forget just at the moment when I ought to remember. But I will try to be better today."
So they went out together on the pier, and for a pleasant time, watching the waves and people, and listening to the band.
But Fred's thoughts began to wander off to his favorite amusement.
"I should like to walk along on the outside of the pier," he thought. "There is plenty of

"I should like to run along on the top of the fence parapet," he thought, "and it would be so safe, only I suppose nobody would think of it."

Fred gave a rapid glance around. A young fellow among the musicians was beginning to play, and all the interest of the bystanders was centered in her.

"Now is the time," thought Fred, as he crept over the wall and over to the lip of the work on the other side. No one saw him it, and he ran along and climbed about under the iron supports beneath the pier until began to be tired. Then he sprang to the of the parapet again, and there, to his at discomfiture, the first person he saw was mother. Their eyes met, and perhaps it that circumstance that caused Fred to lose self-control and his hold at the same time.

Whatever might have caused it, his feet stumbled and he fell backward, and the next moment
was in the water.

A loud scream rent the air and was heard above the music.

... that led to How ill she is!

"My boy is in the water," said Fred's mother.

But others had seen him fall, and already a number of boats had been lowered, and some of the men were anxiously looking for him. All the people who were on the pier rushed to the water and looked down into the water. Presently there was a cry.

"There he is! Be quick! He is almost exhausted."

The boats were quickly rowed to the spot, but the men were too late. But at that moment a fisherman, who was standing on the pier, saw that the men knew well how to swim, sprang off and diving jumped into the water, and presently emerged, holding the drowning Fred by the arm.

The boats were quickly rowed toward him, and he was taken into one of them. He looked as if he was dead, but he was quickly taken ashore, and the necessary directions for the treatment of the apparently drowned were tried upon him until at last his consciousness was returned.

Fred was surprised to find himself alive, and he remembered as he remembered how it had all happened.

ed, he felt so sorry and ashamed of himself that he was afraid to look in his mother's face. To hear the sound of his father's voice. But they did not chide him. They were so thankful to have him restored to life that they did not speak sternly to him. There was need for them to do so. Fred had received a lesson which will remain in his memory; and when they left, as they did the next day, Fred made them a solemn promise that he would be obedient and less venturesome in future.

mount to $1.36 a year, or in sixty-seven years would amount to $104.52. That sum will purchase a comfortable set of Appleton's Cyclopaedia, a marriage dress, a black bombazine dress for your aunt, a German silver coffin plate and a cheroot. Cut out, young man, and paste it on the back of your girl's photograph."

There is a little girl in Tioga, Pa., who says there must be a great difference between her and her uncle John, for God made the girl in six days and her uncle John has been six weeks working on one hen coop, and has not finished it yet!

"Oh, Edith, won't you kiss Dr. McKimkie?" "I'm so shy mamma! You kiss him for me."
